“We are the bullies of the earth: strong, foul, coarse, greedy, careless, indifferent to others, laying waste as we proceed, leaving wounds, welts, lesions, suppurations on the earth body, increasingly engulfed by our own ordure and, finally, abysmally ignorant of the way the world works, crowing our superiority over all life.”

Ian McHarg is a part of the cannon of 20th century urban thought. His ideas, expressed most notably in his work Design with Nature, were at the forefront of the environmental movement of the 1960s and 70s and introduced the concept of ecological planning. Design with Nature was a step-by-step guide of how to divide an area into regions and how to plan for those regions using their environmental features.

His influence can be felt not only in the dialogue of environmental planning and landscape architecture, but in the development of GIS, Environmental Impact Statements, and urban green belts. McHarg’s writings are thoughtful and thorough and remain relevant today. If you have not already familiarized yourself with McHarg’s work, do yourself a favor and check out Design with Nature in Avery Library.
