
This paper investigates if the goals of New Urbanism are actualized in the development of neighborhoods designed by those guidelines. Approximately one hundred survey responses were analyzed to assess New Urbanism on the basis of racial and income diversity, transportation habits, economic independence, and perceptions of community. This study found that while New Urbanists may have good intentions, their standards are not met in practice.