
Tenant satisfaction surveys, albeit imperfect, are a critical way in which social landlords are held accountable to tenants and regulators. With increasing emphasis on efficiency and competition, tenant satisfaction surveys are ever more important for preventing the temptation to cut corners and reduce service quality. As this thesis will go on to discuss, measures of tenant satisfaction are largely overlooked by the funding allocation system administered through the Investment Partner program.